Design Speaks: Artichoke Night School

Session 11:
Designing learning spaces for the future

What will the education spaces of the twenty-first century look like? In this highly respected speaker program presented by Artichoke magazine, we explore how designers are creating environments that facilitate new ways of learning.

MICHAEL LAVERY is a director of m3architecture, a firm which seeks to advance educational design through its work with schools and universities. The practice also engages placemaking methods in these projects to assist in teaching and learning.

SHEONA THOMSON is associate director (academic) of Learning and Teaching Innovation at QUT. Her work fosters the student learning experience through new models, strategies, tactics and resources.

BILL DOWZER is BVN Architecture's New South Wales studio director. He has specialist expertise in the design of new education environments, which incorporate a high degree of user consultation in the development of sustainable design strategies.
